For authors, the definition of conflict of interest is that a conflict of interest exists when there is a divergence between an individual's private interests and their responsibilities to scientific and publishing activities.

The scope of conflicts of interest in relation to International Surgery include the areas of financial relationships, including funding relationships, academic and employment relationships, personal relationships, political and religious beliefs, and other institutional affiliations.

Authors are responsible for declaring and managing conflicts of interest. Authors of submitted manuscripts must openly declare in writing any potentially perceived conflicts of interest at the time of submitting a manuscript for the consideration of the Editor-in-Chief and editorial staff of International Surgery. Additional questions may be asked by the Editor-in-Chief and editorial staff pertaining to possible conflicts of interest.

For manuscripts involving more than one author, the corresponding author (the person responsible for communicating with the staff of International Surgery) must provide a declaration on behalf of all authors indicating the nature of any conflict of interest, if any. The consequences of author(s) failing to declare a conflict of interest include no (further) consideration of the manuscript, exclusion of those persons with a conflict of interest from the review process, abstaining from decisions where a conflict of interest might evolve, and/or investigation by impartial observers.

Authors are asked to report any financial conflicts of interest related to research and written presentations of their work, as well as any other competing interests. Reviewers are asked if they have any conflicts of interests in reference to the manuscript under review. Editors will not make any editorial decisions, if they have any financial or other type of interest in a particular manuscript.
